

Personal Financial Inventory

How much of your financial life lives only in your head? Right now it's spread across institutions, advisors, entities, and your own memory, and no single place holds all of it. This worksheet pulls it together so you can see, on one set of pages, how complete your picture really is and whether anyone else could step in if they had to. Fill in what you can; the gaps you leave are simply what's worth sorting out next.

How to record it: put each asset once, in the section that matches what it is (a private deal in Section 3, a property in Section 4), and note the entity that holds it. Section 6 is just the roster of those entities. Round figures are fine; note where the detail lives.

Keep this safe. Once it's filled in, this maps your entire net worth. Don't write live passwords, PINs, or private keys on it; note only where a trusted person would find them. Store the finished worksheet somewhere as secure as what it describes.

What this shows you

How spread out is it? How many of these answers sat in one place, versus across statements, advisors, and memory? The more places it took to answer, the more scattered your picture is.

How complex is it? If you ran out of lines, or have more entities and deals than fit, that complexity is the real challenge. Simple finances fit on a page; yours may not.

Could someone step in? If you weren't here tomorrow, could the person you'd rely on act on these pages, find every account, and know which entity holds what?

Why we built LegacyTrackr. We made this worksheet to help you see how ready you are to pass the complete picture on to the people who will need to understand it when the time comes. For some families with centralized assets, the worksheet may be enough. For others, the complexity makes fitting it on these pages hard, or impossible. We went looking for something that could handle that, couldn't find it, and so we built LegacyTrackr.

If you needed more lines than fit, or have entities and obligations that don't sit in a single row, consider it. Think of LegacyTrackr as a system of record for complex family wealth, built to bring liquid and illiquid assets together in one intelligible place. Beyond tracking what you own, it adds the continuity layer: the documents, instructions, ownership context, and selective sharing that let your family and trusted advisors understand and carry the full picture forward.

It doesn't replace your attorney or your advisor; it gives them, and your family, the full inventory to work from. It can also produce your net worth and a bank-ready Personal Financial Statement when you need one, and shares only what you choose with the people you trust. We built it for our own families first, and we're now granting access to a small group of families.

We're granting access to a small group of families.

If your financial life looks like these pages, we'd like to talk. LegacyTrackr is for families who know they need a clear continuity game plan before the family needs it.
